Integration of EBSD into a CAD system for investigation of polycrystalline materials. EBSD integrated into a finite element method (FEM) software package, FEANO®, was used to calculate fracture stress of polycrystalline materials such as cast iron and high-speed steel. Load distribution and crack initiation sites were predicted with in-process computed tomography (CT) images collected along the direction of compression. Calculated loads on the cast iron sample were remarkably consistent with measured loads on a formed specimen.The key to this one is the second look and not talking, which just leads to them talking to each other and between each other. Just the fact they both look at the camera, and still talk in some semblance of privacy, really speaks to the lack of privacy. It makes this whole video feel like a play date in a child's room. 7. The whole scene is very odd, but the best part is in the middle when Jordan is laughing. They both look at the camera and then the cameraman looks at the back of their heads. It's so weird. And, in the midst of a raging heart-string tugging fight with his wife, he took the time to pet a puppy. So adorable. Turns out, you can add the deeply-felt "Omg, I'm so sorry!" face on to your list of endearments with this video of Nicki Minaj sharing the Christmas of her life with her fans. The video is a recap of the year (in song form) and she actually performed "Santa Claus is Coming to Town" with a little help from her friends! Superwoman

Q: Is an image within a script tag a valid URI? I'm using a library to generate dynamic JS and CSS files. The library provides an option to provide a fallback. An example can be seen here: If you look at the JS for the fallback, you will see something like this: $.core.async('').then(function () { The client also has the JS file, but the image in that file is not a valid URI: Is the image within the JS file valid or is it broken in some way? A: A protocol relative URL (relative to the page calling it) is a valid URL and is a valid image source in a tag: If you're using it in the form of a JavaScript string, then you shouldn't include the protocol part. It may be a valid image src for the page calling it, but it may not be. See if an tag with the src as a URL with the protocol component omitted can be reached from your page, so that you know it's valid. References: What are the differences between https and http when using Relative URLs (aka protocol relative URLs)? Accurately defining the target volume is one of the important steps in image-guided radiation therapy.
