BachEffect's 2-2-Six is a meticulously crafted tool for calculating room properties as well as audiophile quality audio mixes. The core of the software is the use of convolution reverb, which offers all the tonal textures and ambiences that are typical for a room. Using the widest range of parameters and algorithms, it reproduces the acoustic performance of high-quality rooms, in conjunction with sophisticated mixing and DSP algorithms. Whether you use the sample, saved rooms, or generate the own fully-convolutional reverb using the included sample files, you get a full-fledged 3D-model of the room that is used to simulate the existing sound. BachEffect offers you a template in which you can simply import a room and settings via drag-and-drop. The modeller can be configured via a graphical user interface, including various parameters of reverberation, width, wet/dry mix, room size, frequency response, room mode, damping, multisource delay and microphone levels. The mixing console can also be configured and even saved. Therefore, you can apply the processing settings to your own mixes without additional work. The 2-2-Six software is extremely flexible in the range of parameters that are offered. In addition, the convolution reverb engine is suitable for a whole spectrum of applications. The included convolution reverb setup can be used as a stand-alone plugin, or integrated into your DAW system.

This plugin is based on my original DSP routine, which was designed to improve the quality of songs when mixing 5.1. The original routine was largely ineffective for reasons beyond its design, so I've completely rewritten the algorithm and incorporated several refinements to make the output sound far closer to the original, mostly adding that reverb, delay and phase shifting that are present in music. I have included a special technique for reducing the amount of phase shifting in the reverbs, although some people may find it can be quite distracting in some situations.
